OCLC Number: ocm30963852 Subject: Heat -- Transmission. Excerpt: . . . 1. 0 SUMMARY An experimental program was conducted to investigate heat transfer characteristics of rotating multipass passages for configurations and flow parameters typical of modern gas turbine blades. The experiments were conducted with a smooth wall, large scale heat transfer model. The objective was to obtain the heat transfer data base required to develop heat transfer correlations and to assess computational fluid dynamic techniques for rotating coolant passages. An analysis of the governing equations showed that four parameters influence the heat transfer in rotating passages (coolant density ratio, rotation number, Reynolds number and radius ratio). These four parameters were varied over ranges which exceed the ranges of current open literature results, but which are typical of current and advanced gas turbine engine operating conditions. Rotation affected the heat transfer coefficients differently for different locations in the coolant passage. For example, heat transfer at some locations increased with rotation, but decreased and then increased again at other locations. Heat transfer coefficients varied by as much as a factor of 5 between the leading and trailing surfaces for the same test condition and streamwise location. Comparisons with previous results are also presented. This work was supported by the NASA Lewis Research Center under the Hot Section Technology (HOST) initiative, Contract No. NAS3-23591 to Pratt and Whitney, Commercial Engineering. The work was performed under the direction of Mr. F. Yeh, NASA Project Manager, and Mr. S. Tanrikut,...
